

Religious Representatives in the House of Lords

Briefing from the British Humanist Association

March 2010

Religious Representatives in the House of Lords

Briefing from the British Humanist Association

Preface by Andrew Copson, Chief Executive of the British Humanist Association

1. Background
2. What are the arguments made for retaining Bishops?
3. What are the arguments made for increasing and diversifying religious representation?
4. What are the arguments against Bishops and against increased and more diverse religious representation as of right?
5. Wouldn't removal of the Bishops mean disestablishment of the Church of England?
6. Is it just humanists and other non-religious people who are opposed to the current situation?
7. What can be done?

Annex A – Some proposals for reform of Bishops pre-1997

Annex B – The situation after 1997

Annex C – Religion in the UK today

Annex D – Extracts from paper by Prof. MacLean, University of Oxford

Preface

The UK is the only democratic country to give seats in its legislature to religious representatives as of right. This is not just a harmless legacy of a medieval constitution but a present example of discrimination, religious privilege and un-democratic politics.

The presence of Church of England in the House of Lords entrenches a privileged position for one particular branch of one particular religion that cannot be justified in today's society, which is not only multi-faith but increasingly non-religious. It is at odds with the aspiration of a more legitimate and representative second chamber and with recognition of a plural society.

The BHA has long argued for the removal of the right of Bishops to sit in the House of Lords, especially since the prospects for reform became (slightly) greater in 2002, and the public are strongly on our side in wanting to remove this religious privilege. Most recently the government has proposed to retain a number of seats for Church of England bishops in a partially appointed chamber. It also proposed to give the Church of England new powers to choose precisely which bishops represent the Church. New public agitation for reform – most notable the activities of Power 2010 have motivated us to publish a comprehensive account of our reasoning now as a contribution to this essential debate.

Andrew Copson
Chief Executive
British Humanist Association

1. Background

The UK is the only democratic country to give seats in its legislature to religious representatives as of right.

Some proposals for House of Lords reform over the last fifty years have centred on total abolition or on a totally elected House. Obviously, in both these cases, the position on Bishops is one of complete removal. In a number of other proposals over the years, however, Bishops would have retained their right to sit in the House but be reduced in number. A few proposals would have reduced Bishops in number but also added further religious representatives as of right. A selection of past proposals for reform of the Bishops is in Annex A. This range of options remains that most often mooted today. More details on proposals since 1997 are in Annex B.

The Government's most recent proposal¹ is to retain the right of Bishops to sit in a partially appointed chamber and to give the Church of England the new power to choose which Bishops represent it.

¹ The Governance of Britain. An Elected Second Chamber: Further reform of the House of Lords (Ministry of Justice, 2008).

2. What are the arguments made for retaining Bishops?

The case for the Church of England continuing to have reserved seats in the legislature is based partly on history and tradition and partly on the historically recent notion that they bring a unique ethical and spiritual insight to the affairs of the House. These two arguments are seldom elucidated clearly and rest quite often on weak general statements:

*'The Bishops often make a valuable contribution in the House because of their particular perspective and experience.'*²

*'religious representation helps in the recognition of the part that moral, philosophical, and theological considerations have to play in debating political and social issues'*³

*'The Church of England Bishops' position as Lords of Parliament reflects the British history and culture of seeking to heal religious conflict and promoting ever greater religious tolerance and inclusiveness. The way in which the Church of England's representation in the House of Lords has been manifested over at least the past 100 years has served to acknowledge the importance of philosophical, moral and spiritual considerations – not just religious ones – in the conduct of public affairs. And that representation has been acknowledged by leaders of other Christian denominations and faith communities as providing a voice in Parliament for religion in general, not simply for the Church of England.'*⁴

² Modernising Parliament: Reforming the House of Lords (Cabinet Office Jan 1999), p. 39

³ The House of Lords: Completing the Reform (Nov 2001)

⁴ Report of the Wakeham Commission: A House for the Future (Jan 2002), p.152

3. What are the arguments made for increasing and diversifying religious representation?

The arguments made for increasing and diversifying religious representation are largely made on the assumption that places will continue to be reserved for Bishops and that, therefore, principles of equality and non-discrimination dictate that other religions must receive the same privileges. It is also argued that representatives of religions can make a contribution analogous to that which is claimed the Bishops provide. In addition, the Wakeham Commission argued that religion is an important part of the identity of many UK citizens, and that this fact should be reflected in the composition of a reformed second chamber:

'the importance of the House of Lords reflecting more accurately the multicultural nature of modern British society in which there are citizens of many faiths, and of none'⁵

'the leaders of other denominations and faiths have a significant contribution to make to the second chamber'⁶

'Religious belief, however, is an important part of many people's lives and it is desirable that there should be a voice, or voices, in the second chamber to reflect that aspect of people's personalities and with which they can identify.'⁷

Nonetheless there seems little doubt that, if Bishops were not already in the House of Lords, proposals for the representation of other religions would not be nearly so popular.

⁵ Modernising Parliament: Reforming the House of Lords (Cabinet Office Jan 1999), p.39

⁶ The House of Lords: Completing the Reform (Nov 2001)

⁷ Report of the Wakeham Commission: A House for the Future (Jan 2002), p.151

4. What are the arguments against Bishops and against increased and more diverse religious representation as of right?

a. Bishops of the Church of England

The presence of Church of England bishops in the House of Lords as of right entrenches a privileged position for one particular branch of one particular religion that cannot be justified in today's society, which is not only multi-faith but increasingly non-religious. It is at odds with the aspiration of a more legitimate and representative second chamber.

- The claim that Bishops are uniquely qualified to provide ethical and spiritual insights is factually incorrect and offensive. People from many walks of life and from many religions and none are at least equally qualified if not more so – for example, moral philosophers and experts in medical ethics.
- Bishops may not necessarily even represent the views of Anglicans. The views of the bishops may in fact be controversial and rejected by a clear majority of people in the UK with equally sincerely held convictions – even by a majority of those who define themselves as protestants. A pertinent example is the recent vote on the Assisted Dying for the Terminally Ill Bill, where polls show that 81% of protestants ‘think that a person who is suffering unbearably from a terminal illness should be allowed by law to receive medical help to die, if that is what they want’⁸ but the bishops opposed the Bill.
- The Anglican Church claims only 1,650,000 members in the UK and its Sunday services are attended by only about 1.9% of the adult population. Only 12% of the adult population are members of any church. Many polls have provided evidence of high levels of unbelief in the UK (see Annex C).
- The presence of Church representatives in the legislature has ceased to be an accurate reflection of UK society and, indeed, increasing numbers of people are opposed to political privileges for religion (‘Religious groups and leaders’ are the domestic group that people are most likely to believe has too much influence on government (MORI, 2006))
- Bishops in any case represent only England, leaving Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland unrepresented.

⁸ NOP poll, 9 September 2004

- Even the Wakeham Commission stated that, ‘Some of us would be opposed to going beyond the recommendation set out above [recommendation 107 – see Annex B], arguing that to do so would be inconsistent with the principle of neutrality between those who adhere to a faith and those who do not.’⁹
- The House of Commons Public Administration Committee unanimously rejected seats as of right for bishops and so did the great majority (71%) of respondents to the Lord Chancellor’s 2002 consultation document (56% – no bishops; 15% – only as individual appointments through the standard procedure).

b. Other denominations and religions

- Religious ‘leaders’ cannot speak for the whole population – their views are often controversial and rejected by people with equally deeply held religious or ethical convictions. The Wakeham Commission itself conceded that, ‘In considering whether the faith communities should have specific, explicit representation, we do not in any way imply that they are the sole source of philosophical, moral or spiritual insight or that their insights are necessarily more valuable than those contributed by people without a religious faith. In the reformed second chamber, as in the present House of Lords, individual members will bring their own deepest convictions to bear, whether their basis is religious or secular.’¹⁰
- ‘Leaders’ of religious groups, however they are selected, are often unrepresentative of their followers, being the most conservative elements, and their privileged access to such a position of power would reinforce their reactionary influence. For example, many Islamic religious leaders, some of whom may have only recently come to the UK, are out of tune with their congregations, and particularly women, while the Roman Catholic Church is patently unrepresentative of its members’ views on gender issues, contraception, abortion, and the use of condoms to prevent HIV infection.
- Religion is in decline as an influence and increasing its presence in a reformed chamber would give it artificial support, and a completely unacceptable amount of influence.
- Asked in a 2006 Ipsos MORI poll to select whom they thought Government paid too much attention to, more people chose ‘religious groups and leaders' than chose any other domestic group.

⁹ Report of the Wakeham Commission: A House for the Future (Jan 2002), p.152

¹⁰ Report of the Wakeham Commission: A House for the Future (Jan 2002), p.151

- The only equitable framework in which we may conduct our community life to ensure that diversity does not lead to conflict is a secular one, where the state is neutral in matters of religion and belief. It is not acceptable to move from the establishment of one denomination to an effective co-establishment of all religions, for many pragmatic – reasons but also on principle because it excludes the large and growing non-religious population.

The Wakeham Commission itself raised many objections to the representation of other religious 'leaders' as of right:

- Not all denominations and faiths have a hierarchical structure, like that of the Church of England, which would lend itself to the identification of particular post holders who could be invited to serve in the second chamber on an ex officio basis.
- Many of the other Christian denominations and faiths active in the United Kingdom have relatively loose structures with individual congregations or gatherings having a significant degree of independence. In the United Kingdom there is a multiplicity of faiths, denominations and sects, making it difficult to identify those which could be considered truly 'representative'.
- There is a risk that, in seeking to give adequate representation to each broad shade of religious opinion, the number of people who were members of the second chamber by virtue of their membership of a religious body would become disproportionate.¹¹
- Members of some religious bodies would have practical and theological concerns about any suggestion that they should be 'represented' in the second chamber. The evidence we received from the Church of Scotland, for example, referred to the 'tension' which arises from the fact that "while the Church of Scotland is a National Church, whose life is, and has been for centuries, bound up with the life of the nation, it is also a Church which asserts its spiritual independence of the State, an independence which, moreover, the State recognises and guarantees by statute."
- On a related issue, it is clear that several religious bodies would find it difficult to agree to an arrangement in which the process of nominating someone to 'represent' them lay outside the control of their own authorities.

¹¹ See Annex D for an illustration of this.

- A specific concern raised by the evidence from the Roman Catholic Bishops' Conferences in England and Wales and in Scotland was the implications of the Canon Law of the Catholic Church which forbids clerics from assuming "public office whenever it means sharing in the exercise of civil power."¹²

¹² Report of the Wakeham Commission: A House for the Future (Jan 2002), p. 153ff.

5. Wouldn't removal of the Bishops mean disestablishment of the Church of England?

No. In Modernising Parliament: Reforming the House of Lords, produced by the Cabinet Office in January 1999, it was said:

'In more modern times, the presence of the Bishops became increasingly associated with the establishment of the Church of England, although in law the two are quite separate. The establishment of the Church of England rests upon Parliament's powers over its legislation and the requirement for the Sovereign as its Supreme Governor to be in communion with it. The Bishops and Archbishops now sit by virtue of the Bishops Act of 1878, which provides for the two Archbishops, the Bishops of London, Winchester and Durham, and the next 21 most senior diocesan Bishops to have a seat in the House of Lords.' (p.15)

It would be disingenuous for the Government now to claim that this is incorrect and that the removal of seats for Bishops in the Lords as of right would somehow constitute a disestablishment of the Church of England.

Even if we were to accept that that the presence of Bishops as of right were a manifestation of modern establishment (which it isn't), it still would be only one of the manifestations of establishment. Even if Bishops' automatic right to a place in the Lords was removed, all other features of establishment would remain in place – the role of the state in ecclesiastical appointments, the relationship between the church and the head of state, the power of the ecclesiastical courts, the existence of an ecclesiastical committee in Parliament, the jurisdiction of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council over ecclesiastical appeals; all these and the many other features of establishment would go untouched.

To claim that the removal of Bishops would equate to disestablishment of the Church of England is misleading.

6. Is it only humanists and other non-religious people who are opposed to the current situation?

No. There are religious people, including Anglicans, who support the removal of the Anglican Bishops from the Lords and who do not believe that they should be supplemented by other religious representatives. The Christian think-tank Ekklesia, for example, is a strong advocate of a secular legislature.

Chris Bryant, in 'Being the Church' in Established certainties? Reflections on Church, State, and the formation of Englishness (CSM 1998) noted that it would be difficult to include representatives of other denominations or faiths since the canon law of the Roman Catholic bans its clergy from sitting in a legislature, and non-conformist churches appointed leaders for often brief periods of office. He might have also added that many non-conformists are also opposed to religious representation in the legislature, and would probably not accept seats in any case. He also noted that a Bishops' Bench in a totally elected chamber would be a striking anomaly.

7. What can be done?

In the event that reform results in a wholly elected second chamber, the problem of Bishops would clearly be solved. In the event of reforms that result in a mixed composition, with a proportion of appointed members, the problem of religious representatives remains.

It would be impossible to attain genuine religious representativeness through giving places to religious leaders ex officio in a reformed House, it is unlikely that such a proposal would be made, and so the need to argue against such a proposal is minimal. The most likely outcome seems to be that any future appointment mechanisms would have regard to the need to have a religiously diverse House (for example along the lines of the Wakeham Commission's 107th recommendation that there 'should continue to include people capable of articulating a range of philosophical, moral and spiritual viewpoints, both religious and secular'). This would seem to eliminate the danger of a future chamber containing religious representatives who hold their places as of right.

In the case of Bishops, the Government favours a retention of Bishops, though reduced in number. For the reasons laid out above, this is an undesirable outcome.

It is to be hoped that Government will endorse and Parliament will vote for the removal of the right of Bishops to sit in the Lords and favour an approach whereby any appointed members are appointed on merit and there is no religious discrimination whatsoever.

Annex A – some proposals for reform of Bishops pre-1997

In a number of proposals, Bishops have retained their right to sit in the House but reduced in number. These included:

- 1968 White Paper on House of Lords reform proposed the reduction of the number of Bishops with seats as of right from 26 to 16 (the proposed reforms were never laid before Parliament).
- 1978 The report of the Conservative Review Committee on the House of Lords (appointed in 1977 by Mrs Thatcher) proposed the retention of only 16 Bishops.
- 1978/9 House of Lords (Reform Bill) introduced by Kenneth Lomas MP proposed reducing the number of Bishops to 10.

In a very few cases, proposals for reform have reduced Anglican Bishops in number but added further religious representatives as of right. These have included:

- 1970 Archbishops' Commission on Church and State (appointed in 1965 by the Church Assembly) accepted the reduction of the number of Bishops to 16 and proposed that the additional places be taken by other religious 'leaders'.
- 1985/6 Amendment of the Constitution of the House of Lords (Bishops) Bill introduced by Richard Holt MP proposed reducing the number of Anglican Bishops to 14 and giving the right to sit in the Lords to church representatives of Scotland, Wales, Ireland and to the Chief Rabbi.
- 1998 Nicholas Kent, in 'Enhancing our democracy: reforming the House of Lords' (Tory Reform Group) proposed reducing Anglican Bishops to 20 and adding 12 other religious 'leaders'.

Annex B – the situation after 1997

Modernising Parliament: Reforming the House of Lords (Cabinet Office Jan 1999)

Stated that the Bishops would remain in the transitional House of Lords and that the representation of other religions as of right would 'form one of the issues for examination in longer-term reform of the Lords.' (p. 40) But that document left the question open.

The Report of the Wakeham Commission, A House for the Future (Jan 2000)

Recommended that:

- 1) The reformed second chamber should continue to include people capable of articulating a range of philosophical, moral and spiritual viewpoints, both religious and secular. (Recommendation 107)
- 2) The Church of England should continue to be explicitly represented in the second chamber, but the concept of religious representation should be broadened to embrace other Christian denominations, in all parts of the United Kingdom, and other faith communities. (Recommendation 108)
- 3) The Appointments Commission should ensure that at any one time there are at least five members of the second chamber specifically selected to be broadly representative of the different non-Christian faith communities. (Recommendation 109)
- 4) The total number of places in the reformed second chamber for members formally representing the various Christian denominations throughout the United Kingdom should be 26. Taking into account the relative size of the population in each of the nations which comprise the United Kingdom, 21 of these places should go to members representing the Christian denominations in England and five should go to members representing the Christian denominations in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland. (Recommendation 110)
- 5) Of the 21 places available for members of Christian denominations in England, 16 should be assigned to representatives of the Church of England and five to members of other Christian denominations in England.' (Recommendation 111) Here the Commission also said 'we recommend that the allocation of places to representatives of the various denominations should be done on the basis of the number of baptised members of each denomination rather than on levels of regular Sunday attendance. For virtually all Christian denominations, baptism is the mark of membership and it reflects the basis on which people identify their religious beliefs.'
- 6) The Appointments Commission should have the ultimate responsibility for appointing individuals to the five places available for

- members of Christian denominations in England other than the Church of England. But, in doing so, it should consult extensively with the relevant ecumenical instrument, Churches Together in England. (Recommendation 112)
- 7) The Appointments Commission should have the ultimate responsibility for appointing individuals to the five places available for members of Christian denominations in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, but it should consult extensively with the relevant ecumenical instruments. (Recommendation 113)
 - 8) Demographic changes and changes in the level of adherence to particular sets of religious beliefs should be reflected in adjustments to the pattern of religious representation which we have proposed. (Recommendation 114)
 - 9) The Church of England should review the options for providing formal Church of England representation in the reformed second chamber. Their detailed recommendations should be made to the Government in time for incorporation into whatever legislation is required to implement our own recommendations. (Recommendation 115)

The White Paper, The House of Lords: Completing the Reform (Nov 2001)

The Government stated that they believed the number of Bishops should be reduced to 16 but that the practical obstacles were too great to allow formal representation of other denominations and religions. Instead they stated that they expected the Appointments Commission to make appointments on a religious basis (p. 29).

Public Administration Select Committee Fifth Report of Session 2001-02 The Second Chamber: Continuing the Reform (Feb 2002)

Recommended the removal of Bishops:

‘154. The Government's proposal is that the new chamber should contain 16 Church of England Bishops, instead of the present 26. To recognise the "significant contribution" other faiths can make to the chamber, the White Paper suggests that the Appointments Commission would be expected to give "proper recognition" to non-Church of England faith communities "as they seek greater representativeness in the independent members of the House".

155. The Royal Commission recommended a reduction in the number of Bishops to allow for the representation of other faiths. We took little evidence on this issue, but note that the continued presence of Bishops, described by the Constitution Unit as "a medieval hangover"¹³ based originally as much on their role as landowners as on spiritual leadership, makes Parliament unique among modern European legislatures. The case against seats for the Bishops is only strengthened by the unwillingness of the Government to allow formal representation of other faiths. We note the analysis made by Professor McLean, who points out that the Government's aspirations in the White Paper for representation of other religions is made mathematically impossible by the presence of the Bishops.¹⁴

156. The Church of England, in a submission following the report of the Royal Commission¹⁵, made a case for the continued presence of a substantial body of bishops in the second chamber. This was based on the view that 'a Christian perspective is an important feature of debates that concern the common good and public life as a whole'. It called for a 'certain minimum level of representation' to ensure that bishops and similar groups of non-politicians can 'play an effective role in the complex and detailed processes of the legislature'.

157. But the debate has moved on considerably since the Royal Commission. We entirely accept the case that a healthy variety of opinions, which could include a range of religious, moral and ethical viewpoints, should be represented in the second chamber. However, the political support for a very large second chamber, of the sort that could accommodate the bench of bishops, has diminished, with the Conservative Party for instance now proposing a chamber of 300. The continuing process of reform, with a largely elected second chamber and the active statutory appointments commission we propose, would rapidly make the tradition of ex officio religious membership an anachronism. It is of course the case that distinguished senior figures in the Church of England (and other religious bodies) will be considered for membership of the second chamber through the appointments process (and they should be free to stand for election). This appears to us to represent the fairest approach.

158. If we are serious about equipping Britain with a modern Parliament and constitution, it is time to modernise this aspect of our constitution too, and to bring to an end formal representation of the church in Parliament. This need not lead to disestablishment: there is, as the Royal Commission acknowledges, no necessary connection between the establishment of the Church of England and places for its Bishops in the second chamber. Disestablishment in Wales in 1920 led to the disappearance of Bishops from that country from the House of Lords.

¹³ Constitution Unit Submission (Cmd 5291)

¹⁴ HC 494-II, LR 58

¹⁵ Church of England Submission to the Royal Commission (Cm 4534, 2000)

159. To give the new statutory Appointments Commission time to develop a policy on diversity in the new House, we recommend that the Bishops of the Church of England should no longer sit ex officio from the time of the next general election but one. There will be nothing to prevent the Appointments Commission from appointing Bishops, or retired Bishops, if they have a contribution to make and can give sufficient time to the House to make a real contribution, along with representatives from other faith communities.'

Joint Committee on House of Lords Reform Second Report (Apr 2003)

Notably reserved judgment on the question of religious representation, saying:

'We have already indicated in our First Report that the position of Church of England bishops would need to be considered in a reformed House. We believe that such reforms, aimed at making the House more representative of British society as a whole, must entail examining the merits of religious representation.'

Department for Constitutional Affairs Consultation Paper Constitutional Reform: Next steps for the House of Lords (Sept 2003)

Stated that,

'The Government has previously proposed reducing the size of the Church of England's representation in the House from its current 26 to 16. This would have been in the context of a much more fundamental reform than is being proposed at this stage and probably in the context of a smaller House. There is a separate issue about how to increase the representation for other faiths and denominations, and this is one of the issues to which the Appointments Commission could be asked to give consideration.'

Ministry of Justice White Paper The Governance of Britain. An Elected Second Chamber: Further reform of the House of Lords (2008)

The Government proposed in its White Paper to retain the right of Bishops to sit in Parliament in a partially appointed chamber, and to give the Church of England new powers to decide precisely which Bishops will represent them.

Annex C – Religion in the UK today

A favourite argument of those who defend the continuing presence of Bishops is that the UK is still a ‘Christian country’ and that the 2001 census demonstrates this. In fact the UK, in matters of religion and belief, is heterogeneous in a way unimaginable to previous generations. The 2001 census was notably deficient in its gathering of data on religion (not only asking the leading question, ‘What is your religion?’ but placing the question itself in the context of ethnicity) but even so, the results of the census can give a preliminary picture. 72% of respondents responded ‘Christian’; the second largest group was those responding ‘no religion’ (15.5%); and the third group was those who chose not to respond at all (8%). Beyond these larger categories, within the remaining 4.5%, there was great diversity. Respondents here gave religious self-definitions (in order of frequency) of Muslim, Hindu, Sikh, Jewish, Buddhist, Spiritualist, Pagan, Jain, Wicca, Rastafarian, Bahai, and Zoroastrian.

The census tells us how people respond to a particular question in a particular context; other surveys give a different picture. From 31%¹⁶ to 56%¹⁷ of people in some polls, for example, do not profess a belief in god(s), and the most recent British Social Attitudes survey found that 43% are happy to self-identify as non-religious¹⁸. Within religions great diversity in belief and practice, and not only along denominational lines, may be concealed by identical self-definitions. Also concealed behind simple religious labels is a wide variation in levels of observance and commitment. Research for the Home Office¹⁹ reveals that religion is the ninth most cited characteristic that respondents believe says ‘something important’ about them, after family, employment, age, interests, level of education, nationality, gender, and level of income. For Christians it is tenth. The fact that regular church attendance hovers around 7% of the population is well known, but an ICM poll of 2005 found that 24% of those describing themselves as Muslim never attended a mosque and 51% of Jews never attended a synagogue. The information provided by people’s religious self-identification is in fact very limited and subject to heavy qualifications. Even so, well-founded academic research such as that of David Voas and Alasdair Crockett²⁰ has demonstrated a long-term trend of steep decline in religious belief, practice, and self-identification. At the very least, we can assert that there is no single dominant religion or belief professed by the majority of the UK today and that a sizeable proportion of the population is not religious.

¹⁶ British Social Attitudes survey, 1992

¹⁷ YouGov poll, 2004

¹⁸ British Social Attitudes survey, 2010

¹⁹ Home Office Research Study 274: Religion in England and Wales: findings from the 2001 Home Office Citizenship Survey (March 2004)

²⁰ Such as Religion in Britain: Neither Believing nor Belonging; Sociology; 39(1):11-28; London; 2005

Three recent polls may allow us to go further and claim that a majority of the British people are not 'religious' in any meaningful sense:

1. British Social Attitudes survey, January 2010

Self-assessed religiosity in Britain of respondents did not describe themselves as religious.

2. Ipsos MORI, October 2006

Ipsos MORI, October 2006

b. Respondents were asked: 'People often comment on the level of attention the Government pays to certain groups in society. Which, if any, of the following groups of people do you think the Government pays too much attention to?' and presented with a list of seven possibilities from which they could select up to three responses. Responses were:

3. ICM, December 2006 (reported by Guardian, 23/12: <http://tinyurl.com/y3uund>)

82% of those questioned say they see religion as a cause of division and tension between people. Only 16% disagree.

33% of those questioned describing themselves as 'a religious person'. A clear majority, at 63%, say that they are not religious.

17% think/say the country is best described as a Christian one.

Annex D – Extracts from papers by Iain MacLean, professor of politics, Nuffield College, Oxford

i. From his original paper on Lords reform:

39. I do not think that the SC [second chamber] should contain:
- Ex officio representatives of one, or more than one, religion;
 - Ex officio members of the supreme judicial body of the UK.
40. The choices for the SC are that it should recognise all religions (above some size threshold) or that it should recognise none. There are both practical and principled objections to any attempt to recognise all religions.
41. There will probably be religious affiliation questions in the 2001 Census. These questions may, at least in principle, solve the question of how many SC members each religion should be allocated (assuming that a block of seats in the SC was reserved for religious representatives). They will go nowhere towards solving the problem of how each religion should choose its representatives. For instance, no one body speaks for all UK Moslems, or all UK Jews, or all UK Hindus. It would be possible for each elector to be able to declare him/herself a member of a recognised religion and then to vote in the constituency of that religion in SC elections. I expect that many of the UK's spiritual leaders would be too unhappy with such a constitutionalisation of religion for such a scheme to have any legitimacy.
42. All schemes of religious representation confront the problem of fair representation of those who declare that they have no religion.
43. I believe these problems are insuperable, therefore I think that the SC should contain no reserved places for religious communities.

ii. From his paper on the Government proposals for the Lords:

B5 Table 2 shows the relative size of the UK's faith communities.

If the Church of England is assigned 16 representatives (whether by ex officio Bishops or otherwise), then a total of 77 senators will be needed to represent all faith communities. Many of them will have to be female, whatever the wishes of the faith community in question, to satisfy the gender requirement. At worst, this could leave the Appointments Commission with only 53 crossbench places to fill with representatives of anything other than faith communities.

Table 2. Faith communities in the UK

		N (000)	% of total	Entitlement to seats
Christian	Anglican	1654	20.89 %	16
	Catholic	1768	22.33 %	17
	Free Churches	1278	16.14 %	12
	Presbyterian	989	12.49 %	10
	Orthodox	235	2.97 %	2
	Non-Trinitarian	533	6.73 %	5
Buddhist		50	0.63 %	0
Hindu		165	2.08 %	2
Jewish		95	1.20 %	1
Muslim		665	8.40 %	6
Sikh		400	5.05 %	4
Others		85	1.07 %	1
TOTAL		7917		77

Source of column 1: Office of National Statistics, UK 2002, Table 15.1

Column 3 is derived by comparing the relative size of each faith community to that of the Church of England, for which the White Paper proposes 16 reserved seats.

- C1. There is no good argument for retaining either Bishops of the Church of England or the Lords of Appeal in Ordinary in the senate.

Contrary to the claim in the Royal Commission Report (Cm 4534, 15:9), the presence of the Church of England Bishops in the House of Lords has not always promoted 'ever greater religious tolerance and inclusiveness'. A dispassionate historian would have to say that until the 20th century it did just the opposite. Between 1893 and 1914, the Bishops voted en masse against Irish Home Rule and Welsh Disestablishment. As they were disestablished in Ireland in 1869, it is hard to see how they felt entitled to vote at all on Home Rule; and in Wales, their denomination was a small minority sect. If faith communities are to be represented in proportion to size, then the Church of England should have approximately 21% of those seats. Nothing in Cm 4534 or in the White Paper explains why the ex officio representation should remain.